This chapter examines Socrates' conception of philosophy itself as a way of life, of philosophy as something to be lived, not merely thought and talked about. It argues that for Socrates, living a philosophical life meant living with the idea that reason â€™ conceived as the capacity for argument and analysis in pursuit of the truth about things â€™ is our highest and most essential capacity.

Hadot's central insight into Hellenistic philosophy is that, for most of the writings that we have extant, the intent is to (re)form, not to inform. In other words, this is philosophy that is meant to change the way we live. More deeply, it is meant to change the way we see the world, the way we feel about our lives and the way we treat each other.
